Ganga's Dilemma

Why is the Tehri Dam being called a "white elephant" and what is the controversy surrounding it?

Compiled by Ankit Kumar Singh

> "A civilization which spends astronomical amounts of money on dams and canals, which destroys its rivers and creates unemployment, which loses its self-reliance and becomes dependent on imports, is not a civilization but a form of collective insanity."

WHY TEHRI DAM

A few decades ago, Tehri was a small town in the Himalayas. Its residents were mostly farmers and artisans who lived in harmony with nature. Then, in the 1960s, the government decided to build a massive dam on the Bhagirathi River, a tributary of the Ganga. The dam was supposed to generate hydroelectric power, irrigate farmlands, and provide drinking water to the growing population of the region.

Lost village and its dependents

Interviews of some of those who lost their homes and livelihoods to the Tehri Dam project, and how they have been affected by it.

PARSHURAM BHATT

- He was a priest and 100 odd year old when he was displaced from his ancestral village. He was relocated to a new village, but he never felt at home there. He died of a broken heart a few years after the move, unable to cope with the loss of his home and his community.

MANGILA NEGI

- She was a farmer who lost her land and her livelihood when her village was submerged. She was forced to move to a new village, but she never adapted to the new lifestyle and ended up in poverty.

RAGHU KOHLI

- The dam also created opportunities for some people. Raghu Kohli, for example, was able to start a successful business after his village was displaced. But he never forgot the pain of losing his home and the sense of community that he had enjoyed there.
